

BIO FORCES AND GEOMETRY

Have you ever wondered what happens to radio waves after you hear them as news and music on the device you call a radio?

These common, everyday occurrences that we often take for granted rarely prompt us to pause and reflect. However, for many people, the thought of moving a piece of furniture or sitting with their back to the door can trigger significant anxiety about change. Yet, once you make the adjustment, you are often surprised by the positive benefits—the power of good Feng Shui.

Everything in nature has a shape and contains specific energy. The science of BioGeometry explores the unique relationship between shape and energy, focusing on forms that bring balance to energy fields. Through BioGeometry—a design language—you can create anything from an object to a building and make it harmonious for daily use.

The flow of energy within a plot or building significantly influences the quality of the space and its impact on the occupants. Feng Shui, the ancient Chinese art of spatial design, follows the principles of biogeometry to channel the earth's energy into a building, thereby enhancing the space with positive vibrations. This technique of identifying and balancing the earth's energy flow is a crucial aspect of Feng Shui on-site analysis.

The impact of negative zones in a home or workspace can be significant, and the signs are often numerous. If you have ever walked into a room and felt it would be better without any furniture, the issue is likely not the furniture placement. Similarly, if you have moved into a new location or entered a hotel room and found it difficult to sleep peacefully, you might be sleeping on a grid line or affected by other invisible energy fields.

The Earth is covered by grid lines that span the entire planet, and prolonged exposure to these lines can significantly affect an individual's cellular activity. Radio waves emitted from towers waves, sites have a effect impact on cellular functions at both the level. This understanding teaches us that one needs to take these factors into consideration for our living space and reduce potential harm.

Feng Shui and Bio-geometry are extensive sciences that require precise spatial tuning by trained practitioners. However, general guidelines to create a positive atmosphere in your home or office can be very beneficial.

- Surround your home with natural rocks. Placing a few rocks at the four corners of your property symbolizes strong and stable earth energy.
- Create a square patch filled with sand or pebbles to enhance the earth energy (chi) in front of the house.
- Accentuated patches of yellow, particularly in the northeast, center, and southwest areas of the home's furnishings, effectively enhance earth chi.
